Reviewing in a new light: using and exploring the concept of 'reviewing' in PubMed. To review the literature on reviewing with a focus on how it is defined and used and to illustrate the concept of reviewing within PubMed and how this interface can be used to explore how reviewing is practiced. Review of the literature; PubMed search with MeSH terms 'review' and 'reviewing'; citations and abstracts identified using the technique outlined by Salter et al. Analysing 'reviewing' in PubMed allowed a better understanding of the concept of reviewing with the results demonstrating the current use of this term in PubMed and revealing opportunities for providing users with improved access to information about the concept. A review of the literature suggests that researchers, if they are planning to conduct a review, are not commonly using the term 'reviewing'. Further work should consider, from the outset, the choice of an inclusive research design and the expectation that those completing the review will be able to conduct it in a defined process. Publishing of the review in a journal should also be considered as it will increase the chance of a future systematic review that could use the indexed information and be conducted by those who originally published the review.
