I'm using Visual Studio and C#, and I have a solution with multiple projects (I didn't ask for code samples, by the way) and multiple projects inside those. One example is a ASP.NET MVC5, another is a C# class library. The library is by default on it's own project. But my UserControl and Controls, let's say, are supposed to be on the same project. I thought, "OK! That's great! But the MVC models can be in the same project. Same with the Angular JS models. And the Angular JS controllers." Then I thought, "Gee wizz! I always thought the controllers were supposed to be on a separate project. They don't have to be a class library. I can always place them in the same folder with the controllers they manipulate." And then I found out the this is NOT THE CASE. In VS, you only have one project (the one you're working on), you don't have folders inside it. It's very restrictive in all ways. So my current solution has everything in it's own project, and I'd like to get it to a more reasonable, "SharePoint" way. What should I do? Should I make an entire solution just for SPO? Should I not make a solution? I am new to it all, so all help is appreciated and very much appreciated! A: There are no folders inside Visual Studio. You have different projects in your solution that are actually the same idea, but different class names that can then be put together in a single document. I thought, "OK! That's great! But the MVC models can be in the same project. Same with the Angular JS models. And the Angular JS controllers." Then I thought, "Gee wizz! I always thought the
