THREE Florida Democrats are attempting to hire a lobbyist to lobby the Federal Communications Commission for more affordable internet services. PayPal workers are calling their bosses to report that they're getting internet service from AT&T at a rate of $20 a month, but employees at several colleges and universities are paying much less. These workers are among roughly 200,000 who have requested emails from FCC chief Ajit Pai as part of a lobbying effort to reduce broadband prices. The FCC has received roughly 200,000 emails in response to its request that people contact them about internet service. Comcast is America's internet service provider of choice but the company is scheduled to lose its government-owned access to telephone poles when a Supreme Court ruling becomes final later this year. In response, telecoms began jacking up prices — with AT&T jacking up prices by an average of $70 a month, according to Frontier Communications. AT&T hasn't responded to requests for comment, but Frontier told The Post: "On the surface, this looks like collusion." Three Democratic staffers with Rep. Bill Foster's office have fired off multiple emails each to FCC chairman Ajit Pai and FCC commissioners about monthly internet prices. Some of the email addresses the FCC staffers used are in Congress, but the FCC staffers said they're not receiving responses from Pai's office. Their FCC email account is among roughly 200,000 people who responded to Pai's email request for people to lobby the FCC. Foster's office used the address of Rep. Frank Pallone, according to a source familiar with the case. Pallone and Foster's staffers have worked on this issue for years. PayPal workers in California, New York and New Jersey have responded to the FCC's request, according to the Democrats' sources. PayPal hires an employee to represent it in Washington, D.C.
