In one final move for the administration on a signature issue, the Trump administration said it would cut the amount of time children can spend in group care, making it easier for for-profit day care centers to get licenses. The changes were made final after a full month of public comments that resulted in more than 2.3 million comments, the majority in support of the changes. They are intended to be implemented by 2019, but the Trump administration delayed a key part of the rules, first made public in May, that would have made it harder for for-profit day care centers to obtain licenses. The government will require that, for example, children in centers must spend at least three years with the same child care provider before they can be adopted out of the center. The new rule would provide a one-year grace period for for-profit centers to comply. "The previous rule was literally a gift to a sector that was determined to exist outside the market and was able to reap profits regardless of whether they had high quality centers," said Elise Nakhleh, a senior policy adviser at the left-leaning think tank the Center for American Progress. "It was an absolute gift to them from the previous administration." As a result, the administration has now put the final touches on its rule, one of the last in the "early learning system" introduced by the Obama administration. Under the new rules, which only apply to for-profit centers, the administration said it will require that centers who seek a new license have at least 40 children enrolled in care at the time of the application. Additionally, the government
