To examine the association of healthcare delivery system (HDS) with infant mortality, and to determine whether this relationship differed by infant race, gender, and birth weight (BW). Population-based, cross-sectional study using linked birth/death certificate data for 1990-1996 for all US births with live-birth or stillbirth (n = 32,173,971). A multilevel logistic regression model was used to estimate the odds of infant death. The model adjusted for delivery mode, maternal age, race/ethnicity, and marital status. Significant associations were found between delivery service type and infant death in unadjusted and adjusted analyses (p 2-fold higher adjusted odds of infant death (OR = 2.19 and 1.99, respectively). Adjustment for BW led to a loss of significance for the association between care setting and infant death. In contrast, adjustment for BW strengthened the association between delivery by obstetrician/gynecologist and infants who died (OR = 1.27). HDS were associated with infant mortality in unadjusted analyses. The association between healthcare delivery and infant mortality was modified by BW.[Biocompatibility of polished titanium]. The biocompatibility of finished titanium, polished in a variety of different ways, was studied using a neuro
