In the middle of the 19th century, a young scientist named Wolfgang von Kempelen developed the world's first computer chess program, based on the Sarrus engine. The chess player was a wooden automaton and looked like a human. The machine defeated most of the world's chess champions, including François-André Danican Philidor, Wilhelm Steinitz and Emanuel Lasker. Following the strategy of a real human being, the machine gradually tried to overcome its opponent's manoeuvres. It showed great craftiness, flexibility and speed, and was without a doubt the best chess player ever. Von Kempelen, one of the most brilliant and mysterious characters of his age, was soon accused of cheating and theft, and as a result was sent to the Austrian mental asylum, where he died at the age of 50. Even today, few people know that he had invented the so-called mechanical Turk. Chess Kiosk is a game played against a clever computer opponent. The objective of the game is for the player to move each of his or her pieces across the board and to capture the enemy pieces. The mechanism of the game is simple and does not require complex technical support. In the same way, it is one of the cheapest solutions to be equipped with a computer chess. One of the most... The invention relates to a pharmaceutical dosage form comprising two or more different active substances in combination with each other. A dosage form comprising different active ingredients in combination is often necessary for a number of reasons. For example, it may be desirable to provide an analgesic to treat pain and a local anaesthetic to treat a local condition, for example, toothache. In many cases, a combination product comprising two or more different active substances is required. For example, there is often a need to treat, for example, earache, and local anaesthetic. There is also a need to treat, for example, cough and cold, and antibiotic. There are a number of disadvantages in using combination products. For example, there is no advantage in having a product comprising two active substances that are poor combinations. On the other hand, if one of the ingredients is relatively stable (e.g. the one least dependent on the environment) and the other is relatively labile (e.g. the one most dependent on the environment), then the overall stability of the combination will be inferior to that of a single active ingredient of similar stability. There is therefore a need for combination products that do not have these disadvantages. In particular, there is a need for combination products that have a very good stability. It is possible to provide a pharmaceutical dosage form comprising two or more different active substances in combination with each other, wherein one or more of the ingredients have a number of advantages over the other(s). In particular, an ingredient having a number of advantages may be relatively easy to formulate and/or relatively
