In some labs, large stainless steel vessels known as 'shake-and-bake' reactors are used as the 'backbone' of the synthesis process (Brzeczko, Leech, & Stark, 2013). . This makes the whole procedure easy to manage. When I first saw this trick I thought the man was full of it. After about 40 minutes, all of the meth had been produced. The acidic solution was neutralized by adding baking soda. . The fluid was then pushed through the dry ice. The best "shake and bake" method involves just one reagent, lithium metal, at the right molar concentration. . Lithium metal is added in fine granules or powder at the start of the reaction. . In general, shaking the meth containing flask more than 2-3 times a day will produce a homogenous crystalline solid. . The mixture is often distilled to remove other contaminants. . Water is added until a creamy, liquid product is obtained. . The mixture is usually filtered through a vacuum filter. . Dry ice is added until the whole flask is frozen. . The freeze-dried reaction product is wrapped in aluminum foil. . This meth can be stored up to a month. . It is important to wash any of the metal out of the reaction before the product is stored. . The product can be re-dissolved in more lithium, and the process repeated. . Another approach is to use a batch reactor containing lithium-releasing compound such as a lithium carbonate/baking soda mixture. . In this method, the lithium metal is produced "on-demand" as the reaction goes on, so the meth can be made for a longer period. . Often, the volatile lithium reagent is made in the form of a dry ice/soda mixture and stored at room temperature. I use Swisher, and it is much better than San Dimas. (also called buck). A wad or a wad-o of Blasting powder can take place in a lithium bucket. . Fill up as much as the bucket can take. If you have a lot of lithium or lithium hydroxide to disperse, this is a good way to do it. In such cases, you do not want to grind it up in the gun. . It is not intended to shoot at a distance.
