Cryptocurrencies Are the Future, but They're Not the Real Estate Commodity Several months ago I shared my thoughts on why I believe the real estate market is a great candidate for disruption with my tribe. While my position and the way I convey it has been well received, it's not always evident in what the media prints. The truth is, it is relatively easy to dismiss my prediction about real estate based on your own biases. I know because in the past, a few writers and brokers have told me to "get a job." This offends me for multiple reasons.
First of all, it is not fair to anyone to tell someone else they need to go to work in a certain industry for which they are unqualified. Secondly, there are numerous real estate brokers who work very hard to educate the public about the benefits of real estate investing. There are also many who have been successful and managed to produce strong long-term returns over decades in real estate that have proven again and again they are true professionals.
So to address the critics, I decided to assemble an article from the best real estate professionals who understand the market well. The organization for which they work and the clients they care for don't mind sharing a little bit of their market with me. We're addressing this in a series of posts, and the 1st one discusses cryptocurrency and real estate. Bitcoin is a unique form of currency that is undergoing a massive shift in popularity.
