What are some of the real-world benefits of using Photoshop? Although Photoshop is an expensive application, I think it's necessary for anyone working in the photography industry because it allows you to work on a large image without the pain of having to "grip and drop" multiple copies of the same image. Most photographers end up in the same state, having to rip out small areas that need changing, which means that by the time a new stage of the project is finished, you have another small area you need to work on again, and, because you've been working with small images, you're right back to the beginning again. Photoshop allows you to import several images and create and manipulate them simultaneously. This makes working on images a whole lot easier and less of a pain. For example, if you're working on a new print and you want to start a new copy in Photoshop, you simply select the layers in the Photoshop file. You then click the New Layer icon, which opens a window for you to create a new layer, name it, and choose the image you want to work on. You can then perform any edits you want on the new layer without effecting your other layers. When you finish the images, you simply select the layers in the image you just finished and click the Done button in the layers palette, and they move to their new homes. One of the biggest problems with working with a single image is the constant
