Where as with a USB stick you're only the storage medium, with a flash drive, it has the ability to change the USB stick into a PC where you can use it to run any other OS on the USB stick. There's 2 parts to this one. First, how to create a bootable flash drive, and second, how to load a custom distro on to that flash drive. How to Make a Bootable Flash Drive As mentioned above, the process to make a bootable flash drive is pretty simple. The only real step you need to take is to ensure that the computer's BIOS is set to boot from a USB (USB mass storage) drive. Once you've verified that, your flash drive can be created by using a utility called Flash Disk Creator (from CNet, you can download the trial version here:) In order to create a flash drive, you'll first need to download a utility called "Unetbootin". You can download it here: Install the downloaded program, and you'll need to create a "Live USB Disk". To do this, go to the flash drive's "Disk/filesystem" and right-click on it, and select "Create Live USB Disk". You'll then be prompted for a location, "Format?" You'll also need to provide a name for the flash drive (like: "My Flash Drive"), as well as a description (like: "My Flash Drive") and select the location that is closest to your original flash drive.

The default location will be the first partition on the flash drive, which should be more than enough to use 1d6a3396d6
