Platelet survival studies in dogs with non-thrombocytopenic induced uremia. In some cases of inherited or acquired thrombocytopenia in dogs, splenectomized dogs have been observed to have normal platelet counts. Platelet survival time studies in these dogs showed a normal platelet turnover. In this study we carried out platelet survival studies in six dogs in which non-thrombocytopenic induced chronic renal failure was the primary cause of the platelet count reduction. Our results showed that 5 of the 6 dogs had a platelet survival time longer than 40 hours. These results suggest that patients with non-thrombocytopenic induced uremia who have normal platelet counts and platelet turnover may not require splenectomy.

[Effects of reducing blood pressure by dietary intake and prescribing antihypertensive drugs. A multi-centre study]. The purpose of this study was to examine the impact of a long-term treatment with diuretics and/or beta-adrenoreceptor antagonists on blood pressure. From the data of the Berne Hypertension Study, which focussed on the control of blood pressure in hypertensive outpatients, we examined the effects of a long-term treatment with diuretics and/or beta-adrenoreceptor antagonists on blood pressure for both sexes and for different indications to antihypertensive medication. The blood pressure treatment was found to be effective in both sexes. In women there was no change in diastolic blood pressure, but, on the contrary, in men there was a significant reduction of diastolic blood pressure. The results varied with the individual patient as well as with the type of antihypertensive drug used. For instance, patients treated with diuretics alone showed a significant reduction of diastolic blood pressure; patients treated with beta-adrenoreceptor antagonists alone showed a significant reduction of systolic blood pressure; patients treated with diuretics plus beta-adrenoreceptor antagonists showed a significant reduction of diastolic blood pressure and systolic blood pressure. These findings were true also for persons who could be regarded as healthy (without hypertension, no prior cardiovascular events, etc.) and those with only little elevation of blood pressure. In this case a significant reduction of diastolic blood pressure and systolic blood pressure were found. We conclude that the antihypertensive treatment of patients with hypertension, whether newly diagnosed or poorly controlled, is helpful and should be an integral part of the treatment of hypertensive patients.
