print statements translated to Java's

System.out.println I'm building a web-based service, in which the server will periodically log things of interest to the user to the local console. I thought I'd read somewhere that the print statement was translated to the System.out.println method of the Java class library, but when I wrote the following code snippet I'm seeing the print statement being output: s

= "hello" print "this is: " + s print s print

"this is: " + s The first and third output statements result in the following: this is:

h this is: ello this is: hello So while the print statement was translated to the print method, it's not the same as a Java command and is free to go its own way... does anybody know if there's some reason this isn't the case? A: Yes, it is translated to the print() method of the default stream. You can see this in the source code here. Edit: And yes, it is translated to the println() method of the default stream. Again, you can see this in the code here. Q:

Jeet Kune

Do "Jeet Kune Do a term coined by the Indian martial artist Bruce Lee to describe an authentic “Art of Self Protection” in the form of a system of empty hand fighting. The work emphasizes the full range of the human body and incorporates sparring technique, footwork and blocking, throws and ground fighting to create a true fighting form. Jeet Kune Do is one of the original styles of martial arts, dating back to the 1920s in Hong Kong and was developed by Lee. In the months leading up to his death from a heart attack in July 1973 Lee gave his most popular student, Paul Vunak, an oral explanation of what he believed to be Jeet Kune Do, and an application of its principles became a hallmark of his style. However Jeet Kune Do can be found in a variety of styles including Kung Fu, Wrestling, Boxing, Muay Thai and Jeet Kune Do’s origins can be traced back to the 20th century so it is not without its predecessors Unlike the Eastern martial arts, Jeet Kune Do was intended for self-defense and it emphasized the use of the five physical attributes, stance, speed, distance, leverage and timing, that can be controlled in any physical situation. Bruce Lee felt that the “Zen of Jeet Kune Do”, although effective against a lone opponent, was less suited for a violent confrontation and could be deadly against a trained opponent. Although Bruce Lee was the first to study and teach Jeet Kune Do, he did not invent it. In fact, the name Jeet Kune Do is credited to the Indian writer, Swami Vivekananda, who first used the term when describing the principles of Wrestling in 1898. According to American Karate’s founder, Chojun Miyagi, the term was chosen by Bruce Lee 09e8f5149f
