in Common Lisp, a language without a garbage collector or automatic memory management. You would write something like: (loop for n being the product of all prime numbers from 2 to sqrt(n) do (go-over-it n)) (go-over-it n is a procedure that returns a value as soon as it is called, otherwise it does nothing.) In this case, the value you get for n is whatever the loop body evaluates to. (loop for n being the product of all prime numbers from 2 to sqrt(n) do (print n) (go-over-it n)) If you care to look at how other languages with the same simple core actually work, your candidate list is basically: Lisp (Common Lisp, Clojure and Racket) Scheme (Racket, Chicken Scheme and others) ML (Miranda/ML) Smalltalk Haskell Self Of these, Haskell, Self and Miranda are the most closely related to the Common Lisp philosophy. A: Swift, LLVM, is a suitable way to do this. A two-part strategy is needed. First, find the primes up to sqrt(n). These are guaranteed to exist in a deterministic way (within some finitely many bits of
