The title of their presentation stated: "Transposon Mutagenesis in the Microbiome: A Rant About the Microbiome." To quote G. Church, the first sentence of their abstract: "We are on the cusp of an epochal shift that could provide an answer to some of the great questions in microbiology: Why is it that microbes exist? Why do they exist? Why do they do what they do? And why do we do what we do?" While George Church and Adrian He, in my view, are clearly speaking from a personal perspective, I would agree with them that microbes have been around since the beginning of time, and a major question is: "Why do microbes exist?" I would argue that this is a crucial question for the human species because, in my opinion, microbes are a critical part of the answer. Before introducing Dr. Church and Mr. He, let me briefly set the stage: A Study of "Goldilocks" Let's consider the following analogy. You have a four-year-old child. This child is coming down with the flu, and your pediatrician has determined that the child must receive two doses of a flu vaccine. This means that your child has to come down with the flu twice. While you know that your child will be very ill with the flu, you also know that the second dose of the flu vaccine will help your child get well. When you ask your pediatrician about this four-year-old child, you get the following answers: Pediatrician: "The goal is to make this child sick, so that your child gets a second flu." You: "But, the goal of the vaccination is to protect this child from getting sick, so that your child gets a second flu." Pediatrician: "No. The goal is to make your child sick, so that your child gets a second flu." It is clear that you are being given conflicting information from your physician. A similar kind of confusion happens when it comes to the current situation regarding the relationship of the human microbiome and the human organism. In my opinion, when we consider the question, "Why do microbes exist?," it is essential to
