In a previous blog post I reviewed about four different containerization technologies that one can use to natively connect to an Oracle database within the container. In this post I am going to share my experience of deploying the Oracle Database in a Docker container. I will go over the steps required to do so, as well as some quick tricks if you have problems. I will also be covering the steps to create a connection from my desktop to the container running the Oracle Database in the cloud in the Amazon RDS. I will be assuming that you have already been running the Oracle Database on your local dev environment (maybe using an EZ Load balancer (ELB) to have the container running the database on a web server) and just need to be able to connect to it. What is Docker Docker is an open-source project created in 2013 and is a replacement for the “Vagrant, Virtualbox” idea of virtual machines (VMs). In Docker the concept of a VM is replaced with Docker containers. Docker containers are called Docker images. The Docker images are built from a base image and some additional OS packages, security patches and other packages. By using Docker containers you can build your own “deployment ready” images 1cb139a0ed
