A temporary solution to a problem that doesn't really exist. Simply changing the system clock to the nearest hour of the day would allow you to show the time up to that point in the day. But what would happen if you want to count the days since a specific date, not just change the time? It would only count through the first hour of the day. Below we present a list of the hours of the day. Simply count the number of days since a specific date, then convert the count into an hour, and you'll get your answer. Note: Please note that this will only work on Windows XP. Note: If you're dealing with hours of the day, you will need to use the --format flag. Daylight Saving Time The algorithm presented below works for every day except the first. You can see what time it is if you turn on the clocks for the day the problem occurs and you get back on track. Windows XP – Windows 7 [-] timeclock.man.com 1:47 [-] timeclock
