So I'm a newbie on Stack Exchange and I find that accepting an answer that I find the best answer is a good idea, but I also find that when one gets accepted it has a negative rep effect on the answerer. Is there a reason for this effect? A: It is for exactly the reason you say: people will vote up answers that they find helpful, and they will vote down answers that they feel don't do what you thought you were asking. Accepting answers marks the answer as "Accepted" and indicates that it is the best answer as far as the asker is concerned. This encourages users to post answers that are most helpful to the asker. But it also gives the answerer some reputation. That's a good thing. A: Accepting an answer is good because it: Serves as a sign to any future visitors to that question that there is an accepted answer (although one with zero upvotes is not what is meant, but an accepted one with zero upvotes is) Serves as a signal to askers that that specific question is answered, which may have value in future questions. For example, I recently wanted to know how to do something in.net and searched for the question on Stack Overflow. After accepting a specific answer, I used that information to easily find the best resources on the subject. Serves as a signal to answerers that the question has an accepted answer, which increases their likelihood of getting more votes. If the question is clear =============================== * Single radio page display * * Support * * Enhanced experience * * Support for many more feeds * * Support for the latest ThunderBird * =============================== $15.00Release Date: 2002-10-03Ver: 3.3.0 Version 3.3.0 adds support for Thunderbird 2.0 which provides the ability to import and export RSS feeds to / from the Yahoo! Mail import format. The main features that are being improved are the appearance of the single radio display in Thunderbird 3.0 and the ability to auto-open a subscription. You can also download the source code from SourceForge.net This add-on is no longer being maintained. You might want to try another RSS reader or news aggregator. I am running version 3.2.3 and I am experiencing some problems with Internet Explorer. 1. There are four main panels in the main window. As soon as I scroll to the bottom of the second panel, the application returns to the full length of the second panel. 2. I would like to put the closing of the window under the close button in the second panel. It will appear on the last panel in IE 6. On IE 7 and IE 8 this option is missing. I suggest version 3.2.5 if the problem with IE 6 is solved. I am running version 3.2.3 and I am experiencing some problems with Internet Explorer. 1. There are four main panels in the main window.
