Children with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder

(ADHD) have been shown to have deficits in auditory temporal processing. In the present study, mismatch negativity (MMN) responses to speech, in both quiet and noise conditions, were examined in 10 children with ADHD and 10 control children, matched for age and intellectual functioning. The amplitudes of MMN in both the 20-ms and 40-ms time windows were significantly smaller in the ADHD group than in the control group. The amplitudes of MMN were related to inattention scores in the ADHD group, whereas reaction time and the P50 amplitude in the 40-ms window were related to ADHD hyperactivity. It was concluded that the reduced MMN responses in ADHD children may be related to the difficulties they experience in discriminating between speech and non-speech signals, as reflected by the ADHD scores.
