I am currently trying to convert a native WAV file to byte array for using it inside a native C++ application, i use the SDK 5.1.1 and I have tried to find something on the internet, but not found anything on that. Does someone know something on this? A: The documentation of the "Api.SDK.VX_1_1.Utils.BytesToAudioTrack" states: Convert a byte array into an audio track. If this was not clear enough for you, here's a little more of the explanation: If you have a WAV file containing raw audio data, you first need to convert it to a ByteArrayAudioTrack, using a WaveFileReader. Once you have a ByteArrayAudioTrack you can then convert it to a native track using the function you posted, and pass the ByteArrayAudioTrack to the native C++ application. $- 1 1 8 \text{ Rearrange } (2 * x - x + x) * (- 2 * x * * 2 - 3 * x + 3 * x) + (0 - 3 + 0) *$

It seems like it would be a good opportunity for mini PC manufactures to make the most out of that smaller form factor, but it seems like they are just not a viable thing to build. ====== zaroth It's a combination of the cost, the desire to move beyond the commodity, and possibly wanting something integrated that does not require a monitor. That said, I've actually built a few systems, I think I'm the only one in the country. I like them. For pure, single use compute, it's perfect. I like having a small, fanless, super quiet box that just does compute and nothing more. That said, for me, the real appeal of the NUC is the multiple I/O headers. Headers are the price of entry.
