The aim of this study was to evaluate the effect of the human prostate on the beam-hardening effect of an anthropomorphic phantom human. Four anthropomorphic (rectangular) phantoms (living, female, male, and male-female) were used in order to study the effect of the human prostate on the measured anterior and posterior field-shaping effects. The ratio of the posterior to anterior dose distributions varied from 1.19 to 1.29. In the absence of a human prostate, the ratio is 1.3. In the presence of a human prostate, this value fell to 1.25 to 1.31. A small but significant increase in the Metabolism of 3-hydroxymethyl-3-methylglutaryl coenzyme A. The inhibition of cholesterol biosynthesis in mammalian cells by the addition of 3-hydroxy-3-methylglutaryl coenzyme A (HMG-CoA) reductase inhibitors is thought to be due to decreased de novo HMG-CoA synthesis and a concomitant increase in the conversion of HMG-CoA to mevalonate, the immediate precursor of cholesterol. Using tissue slices, it was found that only 1-4% of HMG-CoA formed after incubation of mouse liver slices with 1  $\mu$ M [3H]HMG-CoA was transformed to mevalonate or to downstream metabolites such as lathosterol, ergosterol, and ubiquinone, whereas 82% was converted to unknown metabolites, suggesting that some further transformation of HMG-CoA occurs. The ability of microsomes to convert HMG-CoA to mevalonate was only two- to fivefold higher than with 10-15-fold less HMG-CoA. Various inhibitors of possible intermediates of the mevalonate pathway were used, and a decreased conversion of HMG-CoA to mevalonate and to downstream metabolites was only observed in the presence of the HMG-CoA reductase inhibitor. The amount of mevalonate formed after incubation of the liver slices with HMG-CoA was proportional to the amount of HMG-CoA added to the tissue. This experiment showed that HMG-CoA reductase is a potent catalyst for the transformation of HMG-CoA to mevalonate and downstream metabolites. away to Virginia Beach the night before.
