I would like to use it as a tag (an action on the UITapGestureRecognizer) and assign a label to it. How would I go about doing this? A: Like so? // Create the action and assign it to the UISegmentedControl // Do not forget to 'touch' the UISegmentedControl [self.segmentView addTarget:self action:@selector(yourSegmentAction) forControlEvents:UIControlEventValueChanged]; // Create a method to switch the the selected state -(void) yourSegmentAction: (UISegmentedControl*) sender { int value = [sender selectedSegmentIndex]; // Do something with the value } // Create a UILabel. The label will not have the expected size (which is based on the width of the UISegmentedControl) but it will hold the values. UILabel *label = [[UILabel alloc] initWithFrame:self.segmentView.frame]; // Set the text content to the selected string label.text = @"Your String Value"; [self.segmentView addSubview:label]; You can also create the UILabel programmatically. Monday, January 26, 2012 A Friend Needs a New Home As the material debris collection continues this week, it has left many items to sort through. These items include books and magazines. I usually try to keep these in my office, but not this time. I have a friend that is in need of a new, permanently/permanently, home. She is going through a very tough time, right now. She has lost everything but her cats. Her cats have been found safe, but now she has no home. The problem is, she's just not looking or willing to look for a new home. Anyone have a house that's
