Turbochargers are well known in the aircraft industry. However, they have not always been used due to the performance tradeoffs associated with the compact design of an internal combustion engine. The present design significantly improves the performance of turbochargers while maintaining the weight and cost of prior art devices. Since compressor wheel damage can have serious operational consequences to an aircraft engine, it is important to protect the compressor wheel. Most prior designs have been directed toward the protection of turbine components. The present invention, however, includes a blade tip fairing located between a center hub and the turbine wheel. The tip fairing acts as a diffuser for the gases that exit the blades. Typical turbine components include the hub, a plurality of turbine blades, a plurality of roots, and a plurality of nozzle vanes. The root of the turbine blades attaches to the hub. In most prior designs, the hub and the turbine blades are cast as a unitary piece. In the present invention, however, the hub is made of three pieces, a top hub section, a bottom hub section and a core,
