To go beyond being a victim of a workplace environment, all women and all minorities should develop a "problem-solving frame of mind." We just shouldn't use these problem-solving skills while working in the White House, according to one manager. NBC's Hallie Jackson asked Trump Chief of Staff John Kelly if he had a problem with using softball questions to answer reporters' hardball questions. The exchange was transcribed by ABC News. "Well, now, I think you — I think you all have a question that's been posed to President Trump over the last few days, and the president has handled it very well. Do you, as chief of staff, have a problem with the way that he has handled the question?" "Yes, I do. As a matter of fact, I have great confidence in the president. And I'm very proud of the job that he's done as commander-in-chief. I think the way he's handled questions from the press is just fine." "And when — when I say, 'great confidence,' I mean it that way. As a matter of fact, he's very smart, and has a very good frame of mind about it. He's got a great sense about what questions are asked by the press, and he doesn't get rattled by it at all. He likes to hear the back-and-forth." "And that's what the press is in this country. The press is supposed to be a rough House. They're supposed to be rough, they're supposed to be tough, they're supposed to ask you questions that you haven't thought of, and you've never seen asked before. You know, they're in the business of finding out what you don't know, and if you think you don't have something that's going to be asked of you, you should probably start collecting some money now. That's what they do." What do you think? Do you think Kelly has a problem with the way Trump responded to questions?Early epicardial ablation for ventricular tachycardia in patients with ischemic or idiopathic cardiomyopathy.
