If you're an extrovert, this is one of the most powerful things you can learn about the world, people and how to adapt and navigate your life. It's the very core of my extroversion brand. We have to first understand the dual nature of extroversion. A lot of the relationships we form are with people we don't know – and we build some of the most important relationships of our lives in these. These are the people we hang out with, the people who love us, who support us and who are also on the journey with us. These people, these relationships are the very core of our extroversion. But there are other people out there too. There are acquaintances, those we meet often that we don't know very well, those we rarely have contact with. But even then, there are the ones we know and see on a fairly regular basis. The people who are at the core of our extroversion are our best friends, our dearest, but also our most important. To these, we trust, we confide, we share, we open up.

These are the people we are at our most vulnerable. Yet these are the people who give us life and depth. These are the people that know how to make us feel fully alive and fully alive is only possible when we know that we have people in our lives who love us, who care for us, who accept us for exactly who we are and who understand and support us in the deepest and most intimate ways. So, this is only possible with people we've got to know well and who we can trust. Let's say you go somewhere new, and you meet new people, meet new people and are bombarded with them, are you going to show your best side, your beautiful, articulate, beautiful self? Or, do you hide it, do you pretend to be something you 91bb86ccfa

The process of knocking over a supposedly strong host nation (they've beaten France once in the last seven years, but only narrowly) and so getting to a match for the third-place play-off with South Africa was a complete mystery to most observers. England's 10th-ranked team are a side that have relied heavily on talented young players coming through their ranks, most notably a group that includes recent World Cup-winning coach Eddie Jones, but seem to be concentrating on keeping them supplied with caps rather than ensuring they are placed in the best position to succeed. England's one positional area they have properly invested in is scrum-half, where Nick Abendanon has been in sensational form in the autumn. But then again, when was the last time they made a great player with the ball in hand at any age? In contrast to England's personnel issues, France, coolly ranked eighth in the world, are the embodiment of all that is good in world rugby. They have the best scrum-half in the game (Jérôme Garcès), a star half-back pairing (Boris Houeto and Guilhem Guirado), a mauling centre (Benedicte Guirado), and a striking second-row partnership (Sofiane Guitoune and Yannick Nyanga). The only area in which they could be criticised is their defensive lineout, where veteran Jacques-Marie Durauska is still, somewhat surprisingly, the man standing in for injured captain Guy Noves, but they are so resolute in everything else that it shouldn't matter. But as I showed in my piece on a rousing second-half French performance against New Zealand, their attacking ability is such that there is no team in the world they can't beat. They've done it before against the All Blacks and they've done it this time. Yes
