How Not to write a comment on another blogger's post (confused mess) - 1arity ====== k__ I did the same and it took me several hours to write down what I thought and noone would read it. So I'm still on my way. I didn't even post it, I thought that nobody would read it, because I'm quite an amateur when it comes to writing. ~~~ warcher I did the same thing for a while. My approach was that every time I had something to say, it was immediately censored for some reason. I found myself doing work that no one would read and was starting to feel like a fraud -- my ego was just in the way. Anyway, I bought/stumbled over this resource[1] and it was a great thing. 1\. [------ 1arity These guidelines are not written for the sake of a mumbo jumbo, they are written so people would easily be able to comment without writing nonsense. ~~~ neild Agreed. I use this website as the basis for starting a comment: [And I learn a lot, because if I don't understand what the post I'm commenting on means (or I don't get the point), it's a way for me to ask a question. And it forces me to think about what I'm trying to say. I don't use the automatic comment thing, mainly because I feel like that programmatically selects the best comment to leave, and what I want to say is usually a bit more nuanced. I also find it inelegant. I've been surprised at how many people leave comments that are almost completely irrelevant to the actual post, I'm sure I'm not the only one that does that, and it sucks.

Enjoy!Federal judge blocked Texas and Louisiana from enforcing abortion laws including waiting periods and prohibitions on abortion clinics from admitting women seeking the procedure, the Chronicle reported. A federal judge blocked enforcement of the laws as the administration of President Donald Trump seeks to follow through on his campaign promise of banning abortion. There are currently more than 40 other states that regulate abortion in some way. Many also include provisions requiring a 48-hour waiting period and a provider to notify women of the availability of abortion services. But U.S. District Judge Norma H. Johnson, based in San Antonio, said the Louisiana and Texas laws represented a "clear and impermissible attempt to'shame women into silence' regarding their constitutionally protected right to abortion." She issued a preliminary injunction blocking the laws nationwide, the Chronicle reported. "The government has no business imposing regulations that tell a woman whether to proceed with or against her decision that she is personally, emotionally, and financially ready to parent," U.S. Attorney

General Jeff Sessions said in a statement. The U.S. Department of Justice argued that the laws would force abortion providers to choose between being forced to leave the state or face criminal charges, prohibiting them from performing 3e33713323
