In Windows, the Photoshop icon appears by default in the window menu or when you right-click the desktop to open a new window. In Mac OS X, the Photoshop icon appears by default in the Help menu or when you right-click the desktop to open a new window. If Photoshop is not installed on your PC, you can download and install it on Windows machines for free. The Photoshop program is also available for free on the Web. Photoshop has a very technical and complex environment, but its interface makes it very intuitive. When you open an image, Photoshop puts it on a virtual work plane in front of you. You can manipulate that image by using a selection tool or one of the other tools and settings described in the following sections. Creating different layers Each layer represents a layer, or collection of pixels, in the image. You create a layer by selecting it and converting it to a layer. You add on another layer by selecting it and converting it to a layer, and so on. Each time you select a new layer or convert an existing layer to a layer, Photoshop creates a new layer in the project. Creating new layers is a very common task for most photographers. For example, you want to add a new layer to create a vignette in a picture. You could select the layer's pixels and desaturate the color, which reveals a little of the original colors beneath, using the Select⇒Desaturate command, but it's a lot easier just to create a new layer. After you create a new layer, you can change the layer's settings if you want a different look. Or you can add more layers for further manipulation. Creating layers using the Create New Layer dialog box The best way to create a new layer is to access the Create New Layer dialog box by choosing Layer⇒New Layer, as shown in Figure 11-2. You can also access the Create New Layer dialog box by right-clicking any empty layer or deselecting any layer. With your right mouse button down and the pointer on the layer you want to select or deselect, choose Create New Layer to display the dialog box shown in Figure 11-2. Layers are always based on the current image view (as explained in the later section, "Laying Out a New Layer"), so you should always create a new layer if you intend to make changes to it. You may need to adjust

The relative contributions of the three major histocompatibility complex (MHC) loci to predisposition to autoimmune diseases are not understood. To evaluate this question we have generated a congenic mouse strain in which the only difference between SJL mice and their FVB/N congenic strain controls is the presence of the H-2Ea MHC haplotype (called E). When this haplotype is present in both strains, the E strain is as susceptible to the autoimmune disease, experimental allergic encephalomyelitis (EAE), as SJL mice. However, E mice exhibit no susceptibility to spontaneous autoimmune disease. The analysis of spontaneous and EAE-associated autoimmune responses will be performed and the mechanism of autoimmunity will be studied. The E gene product is associated with the B cell antigen receptor, and there is a possibility that the expression of certain self-reactive B cells may be restricted by the E locus. If this is the case, then the transgenic analysis of these elements will be critical to understanding the basis of susceptibility and protection in the congenic. Such an analysis would also be an important contribution to the understanding of the genetic influences of the MHC region on B cell responses.Q: making a query that will select the subset of a table I have a table that contains 3 properties: PropertyAddressId, PropertyId, and Value I want to find all property id's and property address ids that have a value equal to 5, so I can process those properties to determine if they have a value greater than 5 or not. In other words the query would select PropertyAddressId, PropertyId, Value where Value is 5, and return PropertyAddressId, PropertyId, Value PropertyAddressId PropertyId 1 10 1

Q: Nearest neighbour search in PostgreSQL? In MySQL I would use the nearest_neighbor function to find the nearest locations in a 2d array. Is there a similar function in PostgreSQL? There is a function similar to GiST search, but it's meant for inverted indexes. A: Since PostgreSQL 8.4: SELECT r.id, r.geom FROM cities c, ST_NDIST(c.geom, 5) r ORDER BY ST_Distance(c.geom, r.geom) ASC LIMIT 10 A: You can use a similar approach with the ST_DWithin function. Here's a random point near New York: SELECT * FROM mytable where ST_DWithin(geom, '0101000020E61000007BD4AF4CAE57FAFD920000005500055000000','1000mi'); Also, you can define a "point" column as GEOMCOL and create a GIST index on it. A nice implementation of the GEOMCOL type is my GEOMCOL_REG: CREATE TYPE GEOMCOL_REG AS (geom geometry); ALTER TABLE mytable ADD COLUMN geomcol GEOMCOL_REG; CREATE INDEX myindex ON mytable USING GIST (geomcol); Then, you can use the GEOMCOL type in the ST_DWithin function. A: I was searching and found this, thanks for the tip! This is similar to what you described: nearest_neighbor(geom) This function computes the point which is the nearest neighbor among those given by geom. PostgreSQL: How to select the nearest point using PostGIS? New research finds that more than one-fourth of human cognition is mediated by the left frontal cortex. The most vulnerable parts of the brain that are involved in cognition are the prefrontal cortex, the cingulate gyrus, the insula, and the amygdala. The frontal cortex has been implicated in a wide range
