This service allows the user to share and exchange color information from images, as well as from other software that uses the service. In order for an image to be accurately color-managed, both the source and destination files must be compatible. You'll want to use a color management system for the highest accuracy and control over color output. All the technology behind color management has been merged into software that enables you to create and work with accurate color information, so color matching is extremely important. The previous section describes some tools for color management and then goes into more detail about the Apple ColorSync system. This section covers how to install the ColorSync on a Macintosh, as well as how to use the ColorSync in a Macintosh environment. We'll also look at how you can use this technology in Windows Vista.

Flexible containers for storing and dispensing product are well known. Such containers are typically of flexible material, such as plastic or paper, are round or square, and may be either large or small in size. Such containers may be of a type referred to as round top bags, square top bags, or tub type bags. An example of such containers is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,643,369 to Larson, entitled "Reclosable Bag-in-Bag Bagging Apparatus", the entire disclosure of which is incorporated herein by reference. Many flexible containers can be used for both storing and dispensing product. However, many flexible containers used for dispensing product require use of a dispensing mechanism which is typically connected to the container. A typical dispensing mechanism is located on an upper portion of the container. When the container is placed in a carton or other type of package, the dispensing mechanism is designed to activate upon opening of the container by breaking an opening panel in the packaging. Most dispensing mechanisms require a handle of some sort to be grasped in order to activate the dispensing mechanism. The removal of such a handle from the container to activate the dispensing mechanism often results in the container being activated prematurely. Such an early activation may be very costly to the supplier of the product, as it requires purchasing a larger quantity of the product than required for a customer. There is a need for an improved container, especially one for dispensing a product in a round top bag, that minimizes the risk of premature activation of the container, while providing ease of access to the product. is prejudicial to the factfinder's resolution of the case, (2) that there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the factfinder would have had a reasonable doubt concerning the essential facts of the case." Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 693-94 (1984). The first
