Alpine rescue teams battle avalanche on Mt. Everest, claiming fourth fatality (CNN) -- Three international teams battled for life and breath during a desperate search for eight climbers who were buried beneath a fresh avalanche on Mount Everest on Saturday. The first of the eight climbers to be buried in the avalanche was identified Sunday as Yuzhen Yan, a member of a Chinese climbing team, who was "scooped away" from the slope by the avalanche, according to a report in China's official Xinhua News Agency. The avalanche hit the West Ridge of Mount Everest, on Nepal's Nepali side, at about 7,900 meters (2,600 feet) above sea level, officials said. Climbers have reported that at least four bodies were found during the day Saturday. Reports of the avalanche came in from areas near the site of Saturday's slide, according to the Nepali high commission in New Delhi. "Avalanche swept four climbers into the abyss," rescuers said in a statement on Saturday. "They have all been recovered." Four dead mountaineers have now been found by rescuers on Mount Everest. The climbers were part of a Chinese expedition. Three climbers have survived but remain in critical condition. "The Chinese must make sure that the recovery of the bodies of the deceased is carried out in an absolutely transparent and proper manner," the Chinese embassy in Nepal said in a statement. Xinhua also quoted Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala as calling for a thorough investigation and "strict action" against those responsible for opening the climbing season so early in the year. The climbing season officially began on March 1, and several expeditions on the mountain have been operating since that date. Chinese and Nepalese authorities are investigating the possibility of foul play. A Chinese source told the International News Service that the area where the avalanche struck
