He has murdered many friends and many enemies.Fluxes of ions and other species in a simulation of the solar corona at an oblique streamer boundary. We perform a series of simulations in which we examine the influence of the angle of incidence of a streamer boundary in a Parker-sphere model on the energetic ions, temperature, density, and the degree of ionization in the corona. In one simulation, the ray from the central source to the streamer boundary is 90 degrees relative to the streamer axis, and for the other four simulations the incoming angle is 60, 45, 30, or 15 degrees. We find that the increased density and increased ionization and temperature in the corona immediately beyond the streamer depends on the incoming angle. The degree of ionization and temperature increase to a maximum and then decrease as we move further out from the streamer boundary and into the solar corona. The maximum degree of ionization and temperature of the outer regions of the simulation, corresponding to a distance of 1.5 solar radii from the source and 2.3 solar radii from the streamer boundary, is about two times larger than the maximum degree of ionization and temperature for the innermost region (corresponding to a distance of 1 solar radii from the streamer boundary) of a similar simulation performed by [D.W.
