Correcting exposure After photographing an image, you need to see whether the exposure is right. You can easily see light and dark areas, and your camera usually records this information, but you may need to adjust the exposure. If you view the image on a screen, you may need to zoom in on the photo in order to clearly see the exposure areas. For example, Figure 4-1 demonstrates how to use the Histogram and Exposure tools. When you open an image in Photoshop, you see your image with the Histogram open in the background. Illustration by Wiley, Composition Figure

More: How to uninstall Photoshop from Windows PC Photoshop is a professional desktop image editing program that allows people to create high-quality images, among other things. Its roots are in Adobe Acrobat, which was first released in 1987 and revamped in 1998. Some publishers began licensing Acrobat for printing work, something that was not possible using a specialist graphics software package. Adobe created Photoshop to take advantage of this licensing opportunity and by 2001 had the world's most popular graphics software, with a revenue of $1 billion per year. The product that formed the basis of Photoshop, Acrobat, was largely developed by two Adobe employees: John Knoll and Art Rosenfeld. The two designed the product to be easy to use and incorporate features used in traditional desktop publishing, such as laying out text, inserting photographs, and inserting multiple pages of text at once. Version history The first version of Photoshop was released in 1992 as a 20-page work in progress (WIP) with the tentative title "The World's Greatest Image Editor." The title was later shortened to Photoshop. Adobe began offering Photoshop as a subscription-based ($30 per month) product in 1992. Up until 2009, when Windows Vista made Adobe's core programs increasingly incompatible with each other, Adobe did not release a product version of Photoshop. However, in 2009 Photoshop Elements was first released to the public. It was an earlier version of Photoshop containing fewer features and a simpler user interface. In 2010, Adobe released Photoshop Creative Cloud, a monthly subscription for Photoshop and Photoshop Elements that includes a cloud version of the software. Since 2012, Photoshop Elements is the base of Photoshop CC, which offers more features and tools in a standalone product. Adobe dropped the product version numbering for the standalone version. The Elements edition is still numbered in a series, like the individual version numbers that Photoshop had had since the early 2000s. Key features Modern electronic photographs can be hard to edit and assemble into a pleasing layout. The major features of Photoshop allow users to easily edit photographs, combine elements, and alter their arrangement on a page. Macro features Photoshop is one of the only packages that allows users to easily edit images with the use of macros, which are a set of commands that can be initiated by a keyboard shortcut. Macros allow the user to insert a series of

Q: How to search inside the MATLAB TextWindow? I have an ASCII code and I want to search inside the MATLAB window (TextWindow) for that code. I know that there is the MATLAB doc search, but I think this is for searching the whole DOC. I have tried with the built-in Find method, but it can only search for a string, so I tried to search for \r after the string "DATA", but this will search inside all the files, so I think it is not the way.

What could I do? A: Found this one, very interesting: `function idx = search(txt, val)`
`% index a text pattern from a string`
`index = find(strcmp(txt, val)); if isempty(index)`

% no such pattern, or the string is empty idx = []; else % the match is at index(1:2)
idx = [index(1:2); index(3)]; end end

It will search through the current text window and return the indices for each text match found (actually, it returns [0 0]). From this point you can get a specific line number using the line number (which is the position of index(3)), or use `idx = find(strcmp(txt, val), 0)` to search across all text lines.

Natural host defence to bacterial infection: characterization of the serum resistance factor. Serum resistance factor (SRF), an inhibitor of bacterial protein synthesis, isolated from the serum of a donor patient with high titre of serum resistance factor, was purified by gel filtration and ion exchange chromatography. SRF was purified at high yield (37%) from crude serum rich in alpha2-macroglobulin. Methyl-cellulose affinity chromatography was used to selectively isolate SRF from the low molecular weight fractions of the purification. SRF was shown to be a single-chain polypeptide of apparent molecular weight 34 000 and has a native pH of 6.5. Electrophoretic analysis of chemically modified SRF suggested that the three polypeptide chains of the molecule were chemically identical. A single amino acid in SRF, cysteine 45, was identified as the probable source of disulphide bonds in the molecule. The purified protein was shown to be stable at a range of pH values and temperatures. SRF inactivation was shown to be inhibited by high temperature (50 degrees

C) and the addition of low concentrations of chaotropic anions. These data confirm the nature of SRF as a protein inhibitor. I know a number of people who still use AOL for mail and online (instead of Google Apps) for their business. There's something to be said for a reliable, convenient and cost-efficient service. However, I can't imagine it being in the same category as a well-made PC: you rarely find anything but the best of the best. My take is that everyone else should just get used to living on AOL's terms and live with it. AOL has made some really great investments in their infrastructure, and any business that is pushing it's way into this new era of competitive technology is setting itself up for failure.

Are you prepared to move off AOL and Google Apps to a great new solution that is designed for your needs? Minneapolis Mayor Jacob Frey is pushing a new measure to invest in green infrastructure and help make the city more sustainable. The city will pick up $100,000 annually for three years to fund planning for the Green Spot project, which aims to reroute a drain carrying rainwater from the city center to the Mississippi River, then use that land to build green space. "I think this is a win-win," Frey said Wednesday. "It's a win for the environment, it's a win for the
