The claimed invention relates to a method of operating an internal combustion engine in which a mixture of fuel and air is compressed in a cylinder, and in particular to the operation of such an engine with a supercharger. The invention also relates to a supercharged internal combustion engine. It is known to provide an internal combustion engine with a supercharger. In this case, an exhaust gas turbine of the internal combustion engine is rotated by the hot exhaust gases emitted by the engine. The rotation of the exhaust gas turbine drives a compressor which in turn drives a compressor impeller. The impeller pressurizes the air which is delivered to the cylinders of the engine by a charge air feed system. In general, it is desired to provide an internal combustion engine of as small a size as possible, particularly for application in a vehicle. It is also known to use turbochargers of a relatively small diameter in this kind of internal combustion engine. The use of small superchargers, while providing a relatively small size for the engine, may lead to a relatively high pressure loss across the supercharger. In turn, this may lead to reduced engine performance. The good news for connoisseurs: In Europe, "La Guerre de Boucheron" (The War of Boucheron) is selling more than ever before. Q: What can happen when a binding between a property and its source is broken? How does a binding between a property and its source work? My experience has been that one makes a binding to a source property by simply defining the property, not by using a Binding object. (If the property were to be bound to a Binding object, then a binding error would occur at run-time.) But I don't see how that binding becomes broken (or invalid). What happens when a binding that has been made between a property and its source is broken? A: That's the whole purpose of binding - to keep track of where something is - so you can update it when its location changes. Eg if you have a class with a property like `public int Age { get; set; }` and somewhere else you set it `Person.Age = 25;` then, the Person object can update its own Age property - because, while the property on the Person object was changed by setting its own Age property, it knows it can look at the Age property on the Person object to see what the actual value of the Age property is - in this case 25. That means that while you are binding the Age property of the Person object to a property on the form, to prevent it from updating its own Age property whenever the Age property on the form is changed, you need to add something like `Binding AgeBinding = new Binding(Person.Age, Person);` so the binding is between the Age property of the Person object and the Age property of the form, and the person can be updating the form without updating its own Age property. If you try to set that binding directly, without the Binding object, you will get an exception (eg. `BindingExpressionBindingOptions`) - it was designed to keep references to objects and to avoid a particular problem (multiple bindings to the same object) where an exception is raised if you try to set a reference but its not bound yet. There's a very good example of an object that uses bindings in an example answer here. and pK_a was 1.14.
