Handling a paper requires persistence, focus, organization, and ability to test hypotheses. The reasons for success and failure are a result of an author's temperament, style, and the quality of the paper itself. At the heart of a good paper are a topic, the approach, and the ability of the authors to use results to explain things. Understanding the purpose of the paper and addressing reviewers' questions is a function of the final product. An author's mission is to write a paper to explain the reasons for which the research was done and the findings obtained. Although there are many high-quality papers published each year, many more papers fall short of meeting the standards set by the editor and reviewers. In this article, the authors outline steps to prepare a manuscript for submission, including preparation of the manuscript, key points for responding to a reviewer, the author's research enterprise, and stages in getting a paper accepted.This invention relates to blade structures for the cutting edge of a ring saw machine. Ring saw machines are employed for cutting and shaping work pieces which are generally large-diameter circular rings having internal diameters which typically range from 20 to 200 inches. Rings are usually made of relatively thin, metallic stock. Examples of such rings are saw blades, gear teeth, and the like. Usually, the cutting operation is achieved by means of one or more cutting blades located in a circular ring which is driven to rotate about a fixed axis. There has been a need for blade structures which can be used with existing ring saw machines and can be quickly and easily replaced when they become worn. Thus, it is desirable to provide a blade structure which has
