**Comparing Grayscale and RGB Images** It's important to understand the difference between grayscale and RGB images. Although both types of images are composed of pixels, grayscale images use the same color for each pixel and RGB images use three colors to represent each pixel. * A grayscale image uses shades of gray for all the pixels in the image. It's essentially a black and white photo. * An RGB image uses red, green, and blue pixels for all the pixels in the image. The two approaches have different advantages and disadvantages. For example, grayscale images are less complicated to create and use. It's easier to use automatic tools in Photoshop to produce a good-looking grayscale image than it is to create a great-looking RGB image. However, grayscale images are harder to read because of the stark contrast between the dark and light areas. They're also very difficult to create in the darkroom. Contrast is increased tremendously in an RGB image, whereas grayscale images tend to have a somewhat muted look. An RGB image actually has more color information in each pixel than a grayscale image does. It's easier to notice subtle colors in an RGB image. The more colors there are in an image, the more interested someone is in looking at it. So, the more colors there are, the more clicks you get. The best approach to using Photoshop in a creative way is to learn to use all the tools, and be proficient with them. You'll find that it's not a one-size-fits-all situation.

33. Keep Your Color Choices Limited. Some of the best retouching techniques and effects can be created using a combination of colors. The problem is, as soon as you use a color that you don't want in your image, your work is ruined. Once you want to use a new color, it's a good idea to save that color as a mask, because you'll probably need it again in the future. Select the color you want to use and create a mask from it. This will prevent it from appearing in the image when it's applied. Select a color and create a mask from it. This will prevent it from appearing in the image when it's applied.
