I've had a conversation with someone who suggested that using if / else statements is less efficient than using ternary operators to perform the same task. A: A good compiler can detect a lot of these inefficiencies. But the bottom line is that it's extremely hard for the programmer to know just how efficient she or he is making a program. For instance, on my 4-core machine, if I have to compile in release mode instead of debug mode, my program can be much more efficient. An even better question might be, "Is anything more efficient than an if statement?" A: This is really a question of style, and not of efficiency. If you start to write code like this: if (x == 1) // do something else if (x == 2) // do something else else // do something else ... and, depending on the compiler and the sizes of the numbers, it may even be slower. It's perfectly possible to write efficient code, but it takes a skilled programmer who understands the trade-offs in the various language features that they are using. A: You know for sure that it is not as efficient only if you measure it. Don't be afraid to profile. If you find the if is wasteful, replace it with an if. If the if is b7e8df5c8
