In case you haven't noticed, we've all been thinking pretty intensely about the future of the movement over the last few days. We've been deciding how to put less money into the hands of our corporate overlords. We've been considering the value of online organizing and how to make it a full-time job in the movement, and how to take advantage of the time-honored tactic of federal education campaigns. We've been worrying about whether we will be able to work together to fight a common enemy, or if we'll have to divide and conquer. But the thing that's been on my mind most of all is this: Is the big business media going to continue to ignore climate change? Or will the media finally take the issue seriously? Well, they've already begun to spin some climate change coverage -- for example, the coverage of Japan's recent volcanic ash cloud, which the mainstream media has at times treated as a climate-change crisis (although perhaps they didn't mean to). But the coverage of global warming by the press has not been nearly as helpful to the climate movement as the coverage of the so-called "debate" by the corporate media has been. I'm not saying that climate change is not a crisis -- we are moving closer and closer to doomsday each and every day. But the mainstream media have treated it like an issue that doesn't deserve coverage. And for all of the journalists who say that this is not a big story, they're wrong. The stories about the impact of global warming on the environment, people, oceans, forests, water, and food are all a big deal. And yet there is still a distinct lack of coverage of climate change in the mainstream media. We're not talking about isolated incidents. We're talking about a sustained pattern -- every issue I raised above was an example of serious coverage of global warming by the press. I was online yesterday morning, and the top search terms for the articles on the front page of Google were: "science fiction is," "japan," and "chart-in-print." (The actual story about the chart was second on the front page.) There were no major stories about climate change on the front page of USA Today yesterday. Even after the Japanese volcanic ash cloud story made its way on to the front page, the climate story was buried as "other news." But the volcanic story has caused a panic in the West over the prospects of a

What's New In?

"You asked, 'If there was one person you could've changed things for, if you were in your position now, who would you want to take it for you?'" Louie asked. "Would I want to take it for somebody else?... Why not?" Her answers to those questions are the things you get from a regular person. And they're why the 24-year-old Louis has become a household name in her own right. Her first appearance on MTV's "The Cut" in September has made her YouTube and TV hits and propelled her to the top of the Billboard charts. Last weekend, she performed on CBS' "Late Show with David Letterman." But her celebrity status has little to do with her celebrity peers. She's just a girl from a small town. Louis, who has 1.4 million followers on Instagram, started making her own music at age 16. At first, she made a name for herself by uploading covers of songs by well-known artists to her YouTube page. But at 18, when she began to make tracks of her own, she drew a wide range of followers. "I wanted to make all kinds of music, because that's what I feel like," she said. "I can play lots of genres of music, really, really far back. You can tell that's what I was going for with my first album." The album, titled "The Wind Blows (Nobody But You)," is a collection of upbeat, fun songs that showcase Louis' wide range of musical styles — she even works with some of the same artists who wrote and produced her covers. "I play bass guitar, the guitar and piano," Louis said. "I record my own music as well, and I try to do all of it." Louis' own music is like a bright alternative to the Top 40 pop that most of her fans listen to, but her performances are more than just catchy tunes. "I'm just a bubbly person with a really big heart," she said. "It's infectious. I just love life. I love people. I love talking to people. I love getting random hugs and just having a good time. That's what
