Some players have reportedly been fitted with a microphone which, together with data gathered from a camera on their chest, helps improve their responsiveness in online matches. The microphone and camera are housed inside a box fitted on the chest area of the player who wears a motion capture suit. The microphone and camera combination is also being used to help "fitness tracking" in FIFA. The player in the motion capture suit is monitored for movement, with body parts used to create animations which can be used to boost a player's success in shooting and dribbling. Commenting on the development of the technology, EA Sports sports scientist Dr. William Brazier said: "We took everything, we took the whole kit, and we completely redesigned it so everything was very high fidelity, which we can actually do. We can collect as much data as we want and we can actually interpret it in ways that you can see. If there's a shape and you can know where it is and what it's doing, you can actually create animations of it. You can actually show that on the pitch. The goalkeeper can see it, defenders can see it, and the striker can see it." EA Sports in May of this year also recruited Dr. Djamal Harouni, who is an official health and wellness specialist for FIFA, as a sports performance analyst to help improve the game. Dr. Harouni is one of a number of FIFA players whose movements are captured and used in the creation of animations in the game. EA Sports is also working to improve the artificial intelligence in the game, with the aim of providing a far more human-like behavior in virtual soccer players. In a recent interview, FIFA producer Alex Young said: "Our agent will be able to interpret the physics of the player and can make modifications to their behavior. He can tell the player to go in a particular direction or to come back to the player. We are really working on how do you make a player that behaves in a particular way. It's not right in the moment, it's how do you make a player that has a certain feel to it." Added FIFA Lead Designer Ryan Osman: "You can see how an agent would be aware of a tackle or an interception. If a player gets taken out, our agents would identify if that has caused them to look a bit tired, or if they are a bit drowsy. They would then notice that and make the player a bit more
