A new approach for identifying and analyzing non-coding RNAs. Non-coding RNAs (ncRNAs) are RNA transcripts that are not translated into proteins and play important roles in many physiological processes. However, little is known about the functions of these RNAs. Current annotation methods that rely on sequence homology or structure predictability are not reliable enough to identify ncRNAs. The recent discovery of novel classes of ncRNAs has suggested that the picture of RNA-based biology is much richer than previously thought. Experimental validation of these ncRNAs may increase our knowledge of the molecular and cellular mechanisms of development and disease.
