I've tried looking at the documentation, but it was no help. Is there a simple way to do this, or do I need to use a hash? If it's the latter, which would be the easiest way to construct that hash? A: for (@myArray){ # do something } or my @resultArray = (); for (@myArray){ push(@resultArray, $_); } A: $_->[0] does exactly what you want. A: foreach (@array) {... } or my @resultArray = grep { $_ } @array; both are equivalent. EDIT: Perl will stop looking after the first successful match. So if there is no match, the array will be empty. If you want to collect all the matches, use the first method. To check that there was no match, use the second method. Keywords Abstract There are numerous applications that use single or multiple cameras for navigation through a dynamic environment. Although several commercial solutions already exist, many proposed solutions use too much energy and are limited in the range of motion they permit. We describe a new approach using off the shelf consumer electronics. It is possible to improve the efficiency of the device by using a simpler hardware architecture and optimizing the microcode. In a preliminary analysis, we have found it possible to reduce the power consumption by a factor of two while retaining or improving the overall performance. One option is to change a system clock by more 648931e174 download. Credit-reporting agency TransUnion reported on Tuesday that a third of Americans suffered a breach of their credit report this year. In a press release, the company says that consumers may experience identity theft, but in reality, TransUnion says the hacks mean that one-third of all Americans are at "risk" for identity theft. It also says that in 90% of the cases, the consumer is responsible for the breach. But when it comes to the identity of the consumer, data thieves are always looking for high-risk identities: unemployed Americans, indebted Americans, "infrequent users" of credit, and those with low credit scores. In 2015, the credit-reporting agency Equifax was hit by a massive data breach in which more than 145 million customers' personal data was stolen. The new data is coming from online security firm Lookout, which was the first company to publicly identify the breach back in July. Lookout says it has evidence that 3.2 million credit files, including contact information, were stolen, and that it's limited the breach to the US. It's also receiving tips from users who have been hit by the hack. Update, 10:50AM ET: Added a statement from TransUnion. Two former partners of Devon Alexander, who is set to be the No. 1 contender on April 19, are suing
