Q: Advantages of Node.js vs microservices I am working on a large software project (c#.Net Core) which makes use of microservices to replace various components. Now we are going to the next phase where we need to start using serverless cloud function. So far, we were using serverless services written in python or java. However, I am wondering if anyone has ever used Node.js as backend microservices. Why would they use Node over java and python? A: I'm assuming you're asking about using serverless. I can think of a couple of reasons why Node is more popular than the typical microservice offering: 1) Install and Host On top of the benefits Node provides for deployment (no pre-requisites, no configuration, just npm install...), another benefit is that it is good for hosting on AWS Lambda or Functions on Demand. This means that you don't have to host your server and applications separately, and it is possible to utilize infrastructure as code to easily update the configuration for your serverless environment. 2) Convergence Serverless's reliance on cloud providers and infrastructure is an interesting topic in itself, and with Node you could easily run your application on multiple cloud providers. Convergence also plays into the Node trend of smaller, more focused modules that work better as smaller chunks. Also, with some serverless providers you can express your code directly in the serverless configuration file, meaning that you needn't write any code at all for other cloud

Focus – Authentic Player Likeness Whilst Real Player Motion Technology (RPM) was a feature of FIFA 18, it received less attention than it deserved. Its benefit was evident when watching the game and in high-speed replays, but it was also fundamental to the gameplay of the game in a way that didn't get as much respect as it should. RPM allowed the artificial intelligence to step into a real-world body and get its hands dirty. It is noticeably more fluid than it was in FIFA 18. Player movement is also more defined in FIFA 19. Players now react more to the force of the ball and will immediately begin turning towards their options. FIFA 19 offers players a level of freedom that wasn't available in previous editions of the series. Whichever of the 44 football nations that they support, players are free to make decisions that are in line with their club's style and philosophy. Many key
