How toÂ .Search engines provide a powerful tool for locating resources on the Internet. A user need only enter a few keywords and may be presented with a number of web pages that are relevant based on the keywords entered. A web page is usually encoded using a variety of different formats, such as HTML (HyperText Markup Language), XML (eXtensible Markup Language), XHTML (eXtensible HyperText Markup Language), and plain text. Because web pages are represented using a variety of different formats, a search engine typically stores web pages as objects having a corresponding format. For example, if a web page is encoded using the plain text format, the search engine stores the page as a text object. To identify a web page, a search engine must have access to a unique identifier associated with the web page. The search engine may access a web page's unique identifier by searching a database of identifiers. Identifiers may be represented in a variety of different ways. For example, an Internet Uniform Resource Locator (URL) is a compact, human-readable identifier associated with Halo 3 .As modern communications technologies are developed, and mobile Internet technologies are applied more extensively, the amount of information transmitted from people to people is also increasing. Therefore, the amount of information transmitted through a network is increasing rapidly. However, because the volume of such information is increasing, the volume of the information transmitted through the network and the volume of a network have both increased. In order to keep up with increasing traffic, an operator needs to build new network resources.

IPv6 was defined to address the problem of how the Internet, which is evolving into an explosive data processing environment, is to be expanded. The multi-homing technology can solve the problem of network interruption when the network resources are extended, thereby reducing network interruption. The multi-homing technology refers to a technology in which a host device that provides a data service (for example, a data service provider) is not a single host device but is composed of two or more host devices, and is capable of selecting a free host device for load sharing in the event of network failure.

This technology not only improves reliability and availability of the network but also reduces power consumption of the host device. The multi-homing technology can also be used to improve the reliability of the network. When a failure occurs in one of the host devices that
