Stress-related syndromes and burnout in gynaecology trainees: a case-control study. Objective This study aimed to assess the prevalence of stress-related syndromes (STRS) and burnout in gynaecology residents and compare the outcomes with those of a national sample of UK junior doctors. Design Prospective, case-control, study design. Methods Residents in a large teaching hospital were included if they were recruited as part of the Junior Doctor Mindfulness Programme. Controls were recruited by the same physician overseeing the study and matched at a 1:1 ratio for year of completion of training and gender. STRS were evaluated by questionnaire, including the Peritraumatic Distress Inventory (PDI-6). Burnout was evaluated by the Maslach Burnout Inventory (MBI). Results Both residency programmes had a response rate of 63%, whereas the national Junior Doctor Mindfulness Programme had a response rate of 43%. Of the residents working at the study site, 88% were from medical school, with 59% of doctors achieving a specialty of general surgery. The highest-risk of being diagnosed with an STRS occurred during the period of initial training (odds ratio (OR) = 3.05, 95% confidence interval (CI) = 1.56-6.01). There was a significant difference in the prevalence of STRS between residents completing their medical studies in the UK and those completing their medical studies outside the UK (50.0% vs 13.8%; p = 0.0002). Burnout scores of residents in this study were higher compared to a national sample of UK junior doctors (p
