The state’s chief medical officer, Dave Ward, and the director of the department, Cary Hammerschmidt, announced the decision at a press conference today. The announcement follows recent media coverage of the deaths, including an investigation by FRONTLINE which aired in January and February of this year. The special, titled “Private Prisons, Public Attorneys,” focuses on the financial relationships among the state, the private corporation that operates the prison, and the “public” attorneys who work at the prison. Hammerschmidt said that the state will bar certain employees from visiting the institution on their own or as a surrogate in the future. The company that operates the facility will be required to make certain changes to operating procedures, as well. “Our facility is not a nation-specific facility,” Hammerschmidt said. “We have state inmates, and so the issues that might arise in Nevada are also issues that can arise in other states.” Nevada has had a troubled history of prison deaths. In 2001, six of the state’s inmates died in what were ruled suicides; one inmate died of suffocation in 1999. In 1999, the state spent $919 million to build an 866-bed prison in Ely that would eventually be known as the Ely State Prison, which is located 30 minutes outside of Reno, Nevada’s second largest city. In August of that year, when the prison opened, state officials expected to have to release about 2300 inmates to make way for a flood of new inmates. Instead, only 1200 of those inmates were moved, and roughly half of them were transferred to other state prisons. In 2003, the state operated the Nevada State Prison in Carson City, the Nevada State Penitentiary in Las Vegas, the Central Nevada Correctional Facility in Primm, and the Northern Nevada Correctional Center in Gerlach. In October of that year, the state tried to use the $12 million it had spent on the Ely State Prison to build a prison on the north end of Las Vegas, but only 595f342e71
