The aim of this study was to investigate how individual and mutual knowledge, as represented by individual and joint knowledge, affects decision-making in group with one and two decision makers. Our results showed that the joint knowledge effect was consistently stronger than the effect of individual knowledge in the two-member group, while the effect was not significant in the one-member group. It is concluded that individuals who are better predictors (higher IK) are better decision makers than

We've heard a lot about the possible effects of atmospheric CO2 concentrations on the weather, as well as what is known as the greenhouse effect. But now researchers at the University of Hawai'i at Mānoa have found that the higher CO2 levels in the atmosphere could have implications on the marine environment. Atmospheric CO2 levels are increasing, and this will raise carbon dioxide levels in the ocean. This could have far-reaching consequences for life in the ocean, so UA and UH Mānoa scientists looked into how it could impact the coral reefs that anchor many underwater ecosystems. A new field study has found support for the ability of reefs to compensate for some of the effects of elevated atmospheric CO2 concentrations, and this could give insight into how corals and other species will respond in the future. The results of the study were published today in the journal Nature Communications. UA biologist Garrett Finney led the research, which involved extensive data collection from multiple sites and coral species in Hawai'i. The findings show that exposed to the effects of rising CO2 levels, coral reefs may be able to compensate for adverse effects, by using their own atmospheric carbon to offset the elevated concentration of CO2, and support increases in coral growth. This may be an adaptation mechanism to respond to the increasing atmospheric carbon, which could be a mechanism for using the atmospheric carbon available to compensate for the impacts of elevated atmospheric carbon. Gas prices are expected to hit a national average of $4.00 a gallon by Memorial Day. The current price of gas on the I-85 corridor? $4.03 a gallon. "We realize the impact that high fuel prices can have on our families," said Chairman Stan Swier, Colorado State Senate. "At a time when everyone else's costs are rising, we've reduced our average fuel tax in Colorado. Thanks to our tax cut.
