Photoshop is only available for the Macintosh platform. It is also available for Windows as Photoshop Elements (Photoshop.com). Photoshop Elements is a completely different program and is a lot less powerful. Toolbars Both versions of Photoshop have two large toolbars on the left side of the screen, as shown in Figure 2-3. One of the toolbars is where you find most of the tools to use in your editing process. The other toolbar provides access to frequently used tools and commands. It's used to move, copy, and delete layers; format font, type, and color; apply effects; and print. Both toolbars have many of the same tools, but some tools appear differently on each toolbar. Check out Figure 2-3 for a quick snapshot of these toolbars. Figure 2-3. On the left side of the screen you find the toolbars (left). The top bar is the layout toolbar that has more tools grouped together on it. The lower bar (right) contains navigation and cursor tools. The standard toolbar Both Photoshop and Photoshop Elements have one large toolbar on the left side of the screen. (The toolbar on the bottom of the screen in Figure 2-3 is the standard Photoshop toolbar; I cover the Photoshop Elements one in the next section.) Depending on the current state of the image, you'll find one or more menus on the right side of the screen. For example, if an image is open and you're viewing it on the Preview or Photoshop Media windows, the menu that appears on the right side of the screen has contextual options that are related to the specific window; for example, if you're using a Camera Raw window (covered in the upcoming section "Camera Raw"), you'll see a menu of menu items that appear on the right side of the screen that are related to that window. Figure 2-4. The standard Photoshop toolbar, which is the default toolbar that appears when you first open Photoshop. The standard Photoshop toolbar is divided into two sections: Toolbar 1: Used for raster image editing The toolbar contains most of the commonly used tools for editing a raster image. You can access some of the tools from the first menu option that appears when you press the (M) key on your keyboard. You can see the items in the following list: * Brush * Eraser * Paint Bucket * Eyedropper * Select

The first major government shutdown of the Trump administration began on Saturday and is widely seen as an attempt by President Donald Trump to force funding for his long-sought border wall. But experts say the shutdown isn't likely to have much of an impact on the economy or public safety. The government is funded until midnight, but around 13,000 federal employees will be out of a job after Trump declined to sign a continuing resolution and Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin told Congress earlier that day he was unable to obtain enough funding for the wall. The president is pressuring congressional Democrats to drop their opposition to the wall. To be sure, many federal employees are on high-risk details that need to be funded, including soldiers and medical staff. But many other employees in Trump's agencies are support staff who will not be missed. There's also a wide gap in the likelihood of a short-term government shutdown versus a long-term shutdown. The first is possible, but more likely to be limited to just a few days; the latter can go on for months or even years. David Marquez, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at the University of Texas at Austin, says the effects of a shutdown won't be felt for months and in the meantime, the government will be doing what it does in the event of a shutdown. "Federal law enforcement and many other key agencies will not be affected," he said. "And most of the other agencies can survive on their existing money supply. It's not like the government is going to go into a complete shutdown for the duration of the partial shutdown." The Federal Aviation Administration, which oversees air traffic control and other federal agencies that help civil aviation, is set to continue running in the event of a shutdown, so operators will be working. That will include the air traffic controllers. "Safety is paramount," said Greg LaTorre, an aviation safety expert and director of the National Air Traffic Safety Institute. "If the shutdown goes on long enough, then there will be a lapse in air traffic control. And you do have people monitoring those systems remotely." The Coast Guard will continue to patrol the waterways and monitor the borders. Social security payments will be sent out in the event of a shutdown, as will payments to veterans, but many of these services are expected to be self-sufficient. But some other services, such as the FBI and DEA, will cease operations. "The shutdown is a major inconvenience for most people
