Q: Is this good idea to add server's internal IP to the Windows hosts file in the guest OS? It will be easier to access my server from the Internet, so I think it is a good idea to add "192.168.1.100" to the hosts file in Windows 7 guest OS. I know there are several issues, such as the guest will be aware about my server's internal IP. I don't need that, I just want to make it easier to access. If this is the correct way to do it, how can I create a new hosts file using Windows hosts file editing tool in Windows 7 guest OS? A: Windows comes with its own DNS server. It has both a local TCP/IP name server (can also be a WINS server). Once you connect to it, your PC's DNS gets updated as well. So you're only affecting the guest OS's DNS resolution while connected to the server. EDIT: You could of course also put your own DNS server behind the guest network interface. You could for example use FreeDNS and put the DNS IP in the Hosts file. A: No, never do that. If you are just looking for a way to access you server from the outside world you should: Setup a NAT (network address translation) Setup a router (internet accessible) Install DDNS (domain name system) Add your server name to your hosts file When you are accessing your server from the Internet, your router will first forward all traffic coming to your server to the NAT. Your NAT will return the appropriate traffic to your router, which will further forward it to your router. You could either configure your router to simply forward everything to the Internet or you could have a normal router but add some port forwarding to the router. All you need to do is create a port forward on the port you need to access from the outside world (It usually has to be TCP 21/tcp 22/udp 80/tcp 443/udp 53). The association of tumour necrosis factor and its receptor with inflammatory cells in acute surgical stress.
